Chris brings nearly 18 years of legal experience and eight years of organizational leadership to his energy practice, with particular depth in nuclear energy and infrastructure governance. His nuclear energy practice encompasses regulatory compliance, policy, licensing, and workplace investigations. He has provided strategic counsel on nuclear, power origination, and renewable energy programs, and has significant experience in administrative litigation related to the licensing and operation of nuclear plants. Chris also has extensive experience addressing other matters governed by the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, including regulatory investigations and assessments, enforcement actions, nuclear safety culture and safety-conscious work environment, and retaliation and other misconduct allegations arising under the Energy Reorganization Act.

Prior to joining Baker Donelson, Chris served for over 15 years as in-house counsel at a large utility company, where he advised senior executives and other internal stakeholders on compliance, regulatory, and policy issues, particularly in the areas of nuclear energy, transmission, and power supply.
